Not illustrated. 1836 Excerpt: .the silvery white head has a tinge of brown; and the higher the heat the browner will be the head. In low heats the silvery head does not appear, neither is it so close, firm, bright, or lively in flavor; in very low heats the head will not stand, but fly off instantly, and the tap will be thick and muddy.--Here arises the danger of acidity, from the penetration of the external air, which, if once caught, will never be a sound liquor. In brewing very small quantities, in places exposed, the same retention of heat in the mash cannot be expected; and although the heat of the tap will, on this account, differ, yet the character of the tap will be similar. Such exposed places should be remedied; and the best remedy is, in not letting the mash stand so long; because the liquor will not draw the malt, while thus cooling. If two mashes are made for the strong, the second mash may be taken 10 or 12 higher than the first mash; if three mashes, instead of 10 or 12, take 5 or 6 for each, and the fourth mash 160. A large body of malt will obtain the required heat in the mash, with a heat somewhat lower than a small quantity, on account of the greater capacity and depth, and the less surface of wood and metal; the effervescence and powers of retention of heat, for the above reasons, are increased....
